About the FDP

Multidisciplinary approaches in research on languages and literatures integrate the knowledge of different disciplines to analyse the problem/theme. The methodologies from diverse fields such as anthropology, psychology, cultural studies, philosophy, digital and medical humanities, provide a more comprehensive framework for literary analysis. The future of language and literature research lies in fostering collaborations across disciplines. For instance, collaborations between linguists and anthropologists can lead to a deeper understanding of how language interacts with cultural practices. Similarly, the use of digital humanities tools, including text mining and data visualization, facilitates large-scale analysis of stylistic and thematic patterns, offering new insights into both established and emerging literary traditions. By broadening analytical frameworks and fostering interdisciplinary connections, these approaches not only enhance academic inquiry, but also demonstrate the relevance of literary studies to contemporary societal issues, such as social justice, digital transformation, and public health.

Objectives:

- To foster a dynamic learning environment.
- To explore multidisciplinary approaches in languages and literatures.
- To develop skills in leveraging digital tools and platforms for linguistic and literary analysis.
- To engage in interdisciplinary discussions to address contemporary issues in language and literature studies.
- To promote collaborations and networking opportunities among educators and researchers in the field.
